

What have we learned from the design of Australian Schools?

The speaker Dr Cameron Logan is part of a multi-discipline research team examining the history of innovation in the design and use of Australian schools across the twentieth century. Their research is focused on innovations in planning and architectural expression that accompanied new approaches to teaching both primary and secondary school children. Researchers are contextualizing Australian developments by comparing them with those in North America and Europe during the same period.

In 2012 with Hannah Lewi he convened the symposium from Classroom to Campus: The Heritage of Modern Education and was also an organiser of and presenter at the recent symposium 'School is Another Place'. That event, held at Kings College in London, brought together scholars from education, architecture and planning to discuss the design of schools across the twentieth century all around the world.

Cameron is Lecturer in Urban Heritage at the University of Melbourne and author of Historic Capital: Preservation, Race and Real Estate in Washington, D.C., forthcoming (University of Minnesota Press)
